I attended the Design and Place industry forum yesterday evening in Sydney at the Teachers Federation Conference Centre.

I am glad to have attended.

With the pending changes to current planning guidelines and rules including the inclusion of new considerations for better built environments and spaces, has it been considered that generally modern materials and buildings do not age well and that design fads, styles and trends change quickly so that a building or space can be praised as being innovative today but will often become outdated in the not to distant future. Therefore requiring large and expensive makeovers resulting in waste production.

Currently here are buildings being completed for occupation and due to a number of factors including questionable design, colour and material choices, context resolution and etc, the day they are completed is the day they should be demolished.

I agree to the above statement
