I would like to contribute my opinion to the discussion. Although I am not a landowner in the Rosebery area which is under consideration here (I live in Rosebery however outside the area), I support the proposed freeze on development of houses above one storey. The reason is that too many medium and high-rise buildings have been built nearby which brings a lot of pressure on the neighbourhood and there needs to be time to adjust to the influx of traffic and people. In general, would be great to have the buildings built as low as possible since the beauty of Sydney is that you can actually see the sky. I understand there is an increase in demand however it should not be at the expense of quality of life.
